This invention relates to high pressure discharge lamps and more specifically to a high pressure discharge lamp which uses a lamp starting aid of the halogen type. It has recently become desirable to use a starting aid in high pressure discharge lamps to facilitate starting a discharge in the lamp. A starting aid is a composition placed at the desired discharge starting voltage and temperature to facilitate starting of the lamp. A starting aid which is active when the lamp is turned on will reduce the warm-up time of the lamp. During warm-up the lamp envelope wall temperature is elevated which, in some circumstances, can be detrimental to lamp life. A starting aid which is inactive when the lamp is turned on does not give rise to any harmful effects to the lamp during warm-up. Various halogen containing starting aids which are active only when the lamp is turned on have been proposed. One type of lamp starting aid is a mixture of lithium iodide and bromide which is active only when the lamp is turned on. See, for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,022,096 and 4,322,841. One practical difficulty with the mixture is that it tends to decompose with long-term exposure at the temperature in the lamp envelope. Another type of starting aid described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,508,552 is formed from compounds containing iodine and bromine. These compounds are active only when the lamp is turned on. In order to improve the effectiveness of these compounds the mole ratio of the bromine to the iodine is adjusted to about 1.6:1. The bromine can cause undesirable effects at normal operating temperatures.
